Goucher College will purchase renewable energy from Constellation Energy's NewEnergy subsidiary to match part of the college's electricity consumption.

Constellation (NYSE: CEG) will provide Towson-based Goucher with renewable energy certificates to match 25 percent of the school's estimated electricity usage for the next three years. One certificate stands for one megawatt hour of electricity created from a renewable energy source. The certificates can offset greenhouse gas emissions and support development of domestic sources of renewable energy.

Goucher's certificates will come from wind energy sources certified by Green-e Energy, an independent verification program for renewable energy. Green-e Energy certifies eligible sources, like wind, solar, geothermal or biomass energies.

"Environmental sustainability is a major component of Goucher's strategic plan, and this purchase is an important step in fulfilling our commitment to reduce greenhouse gas emissions," said Sanford J. Ungar, president of Goucher College, said in a statement Tuesday.

The college said recently it was partnering with ZipCar, a car-sharing program. Goucher also has recycling, composting, sustainable food service, and energy conservation programs.

The Maryland Energy Administration, University System of Maryland, Baltimore City and Montgomery County recently announced the organizations will jointly ask developers to submit plans for wind, solar, biofuel and natural gas projects in Maryland by the end of the year.

While Goucher is not formally part of the joint effort, state officials have projected electricity shortages may begin in the region by 2011, and that new generation is essential to meeting the rising demand for energy.
